Multi-Award Winning Nantwich Bookshop Coffee Lounge

A Little Bit of History...

Built soon after the Fire of Nantwich (1583), the Bookshop and Coffee Lounge on the square offers an excellent example of architecture from this period.

Seen from the front there is a distinct 'sinking' to the centre of the building. This is also prominent internally on the 2nd floor. The cause is supposedly due to half the building having been constructed (1584) over Castle Street's cobblestones and the other half over the then filled, dry moat of the castle. (Mini piles and a steel frame have been utilised to stabilise the building.) The sinking is fairly recent (in terms of the building's age) as photographs from the turn of the last century show. (See photo in front left hand room).

There are four main features of interest within the Coffee Lounge:

The front right hand room has floor to ceiling oak panelling. The panelling was originally throughout the whole of the first floor. The floor boards are also thought to date back to 1583..

Above the serving area is a Tudor 'Vine' plaster ceiling that has been carefully restored and copied. These would have been house warming gifts from local merchants.

The front left hand room's right hand wall has a wonderful example of 'builders score marks'. These were used to line up the appropriate sections of timber. The timber is scored/etched throughout to allow plaster to successfully adhere to the wood.

The fourth area is up the narrow staircase leading from the coffee lounge... "Watch your head!" This area has hardly changed in 420 years and would have housed the servants and certain small livestock (during winter months). There are 3 bedrooms on the right hand side and a communal area to the front.

Feel free to ask the waitresses to point out any of the features and please inform a member of staff should you wish to venture upstairs.
